On the studio's east wall, Picasso painted this version of Three Musicians opposite its narrower counterpart. Each painting represents a trio of performers, but with key differences. Here the palette is more somber; Harlequin and Pierrot switch places; the monk wears clothing typical of the Benedictine, not Franciscan, order; and a dog joins the scene. Materially, the two cubist works remain connected with each other, and with The Museum of Modern Art's classically inspired Three Women at the Spring. Picasso painted the three compositions on pieces of canvas cut from the same roll.
